Doris Lessing's love affair with cats began at a young age, when she became intrigued with the semiferal creatures on the African farm where she grew up. Her fascination with the handsome, domesticated creatures that have shared her flats and her life in London remained undiminished, and grew into real love with the awkwardly lovable El Magnifico, the last cat to share her home.

This little book is about the cats Doris Lessing has known or lived with, two in particular, Grey Cat and Black Cat, who are as different in character, temperament and tastes as two people, and who now share her life, mostly in London, sometimes in a Devon cottage. They are both half Siamese, and have Siamese traits: they talk, growl, complain, express themselves volubly in a number of ways.

Convinced while still young of the brutishness of existence, Lessing maintained a rapt yet oddly detached interest in cats as fellow sufferers and would-be survivors. Here she recalls the lives (and woes) of sundry cats and sidelong humans with a compelling, almost metaphysical, darkness.

Only 126 pages long, Particularly Cats was published in 1967, when Lessing was close to fifty. The book begins with an account of when she was growing up, in the 1920s, on a farm in Rhodesia (now Zimbabwe); it ends with her, some thirty years later, living in a spacious house in a good neighborhood in London; and all the way through, there are cats: cats domesticated and wild, cats friendly and dangerous, cats beautiful and ugly, smart and stupid.

review 1: This book covers the relationships Lessing has had throughout her life with cats. I struggled with the start of it, as she described the harsh realities of living on a farm in Africa and being surrounded by too many wild cats that needed "disposing of", but I'm glad I made it past the first part of the book as Lessing goes on to talk about other cat-friends she's had through her life ...
